"PREPARED BY AND FOR THE WALT DISNEY WORLD CAST"

APRIL 2, 1982

A NEW SOUND FOR "FANTASIA"

Walt Disney was not a musician nor were the majority of his artists. Yet like most of us, they were good listeners. In the late 1930's when the studio first began tackling "Fantasia," which combined the talents of Disney and music great Leopold Stokowski, they simply listened and tried to capture the moods, movements, situations, colors, and characters which the music painted on the canvas of their imaginations.

Now more than 40 years since its initial release, "Fantasia" returns triumphantly with a brand new state-of-the-art sound track that is both faithful to Stokowski's original score and in step with the film's tradition as an innovator in the use of sight and sound. Under the direction of two-time Academy Award-winner ("The Sound of Music," "West Side Story") Irwin Kostal, a 125-piece symphony orchestra recorded a new digital, Dolby stereo soundtrack for "Fantasia," which will be re-released this month.

When "Fantasia" first burst on the scene in 1940 it presented the first application of stereophonic sound in motion pictures. Disney technicians in collaboration with RCA created "Fantasound," a directional and third dimensional effect which allowed audiences of that day to hear the music of a great symphony orchestra with a startling and rich new realism. In effect, it was a primitive stereo sound which required the installation of $85,000 worth of projectors and loud speakers including 90 special speakers.

A LOOK AT SPACESHIP EARTH

Spaneship Earth, the world's first geosphere, will dominate the entranceway to Epcot Center when it opens October 1, 1982.

A unique architectural achievement, the 18-story sphere houses one of Future World's most exciting presentations, dramatizing man's ability to survive by communicating with fellow humans. Spaceship Earth is presented by Bell System.

It is the first large-scale geodesic structure to achieve a complete sphere shape, being supported 15 feet off the ground by six huge steel legs. Visitors to Future World can actually walk beneath the mammoth globe.

One hundred and sixty-five feet in diameter, the geosphere encompasses 2,200,000 cubic feet of space with an outside surface area of 150,000 square feet.

Actually, Spaceship Earth is two separate spherical structures, one inside the other. The inner sphere is composed of 1,450 structural steel members arranged in giant triangular fashion, typical geodesic form.

The inner core also contains decking at several levels, and a spiral route for Spaceship Earth's ride system which carries visitors through centuries of man's achievements in communication arts. It is covered by a waterproof membrane to protect the inner workings.

The outer-sphere facade is held about two feet away from the inner core by aluminum hubs and contains aluminum support frames for 954 silvery triangular aluminum panels. With spotlights at night, the highly reflective surface will be visible for many miles.

While there are other large geodesic domes in the world covering arenas, oil tanks, etc., they are only half spheres.

Spaceship Earth is raised clear of the earth beneath it to make a dramatic entryway which could rival some of the world's most famous uniquely shaped structures.

The nearest rival to the structure probably was the 180-foot nongeodesic perisphere built for the 1939 New York World's Fair with a smooth exterior supported on eight legs. It was just barely off the ground, served as a visual symbol and was demolished at the close of the fair.

Other structures considered by architects in designing Spaceship Earth include the Roman Parthenon in the second century, the dome of Saint Peter's Cathedral in the Vatican, which is 150 feet high and 107 feet in diameter, and a 125-foot diameter steel frame supporting a map of the world at the 1964-65 World's Fair.

"FANTASIA" IS CHALLENGE OF A LIFETIME FOR GHOST CONDUCTOR IRWIN KOSTAL

"Fantasia's" bold new digital and Dolby stereo sound track is designed to excite audiences of today in much the same way that "Fantasound" affected moviegoers in 1940.

Conductor Kostal used Stokowski's original arrangements for some sections of the film and re-orchestrated others. For example, on the "Night on Bald Mountain" sequence, featuring the music of Moussorgsky, Kostal will use a bolder arrangement more in line with the original composition.

According to him, this new version of "Fantasia" is still designed to approximate the concert experience, only it will be less gimmicky and more real than the original.

"Stereo was a novelty back in those days," says Irwin. "They didn't know how to make the best use of this new tool. Now with digital, we can go from a teeny whisper to a big crash with clarity and precision."

"'Fantasia' is still the most effective blending of sound and picture in a theatrical motion picture," Irwin explained. He considers this assignment the most challenging in his distinguished career.

Recording the new sound track with the largest orchestra ever assembled for a film score posed some special challenges for Disney, including finding a location large enough for the orchestra and a 50-voice choir. Therefore, the two-week session took place at the CBS Studio Center scoring stage in California.

At least four of the musicians involved in the re-recording of "Fantasia" also took part in the 1937 session. Bassoonists Don Christleib and Jack Marsh, George Cast (violin), and Sven Reher (viola) will reprise on their respective instruments. Veteran Disney sound effects wizard Jimmy Macdonald, who played timpani on the original film worked on the new click track (a tempo-setting device for synchronizing music and visuals).

"Fantasia," the only Disney animated feature in continuous release, is scheduled for special engagements this Easter in its newly recorded format. The film has always been considered ahead of its time and with its new sound track, that distinction is likely to remain.

If a ghostwriter is someone who writes speeches or books for another person then Irwin Kostal must be considered a "ghost conductor." The two-time Academy Award-winning conductor/composer/arranger recently completed the prestigious assignment of re-recording the sound track for Walt Disney's classic "Fantasia."

Although music great Leopold Stokowski is still the on-screen conductor, it is "ghost conductor" Kostal whose music is actually heard. "Fantasia's" new state-of-the-art digital, Dolby stereo sound track is a vast improvement over the 1940 original, which had used what was then the most advanced technology available.

"Tremendous advancements have been made in recording technology since Mr. Stokowski first recorded 'Fantasia,'" explains Kostal. "With the new digital capability, we can be twice as loud or twice as soft. We can go from 0 to 120 decibels and really rock the theater if we want to."

"Kostal's enthusiasm for the 'Fantasia' project knows no limits. He considers it the most challenging work he has ever done. "Up till now," says the conductor, "it's all been easy."

"This is the first assignment that's literally taken every bit of background and training I've had. I really had to do my homework."

And lots of homework was required. Prior to the recording sessions Kostal spent three months reviewing the film one frame at a time with sound editor Dennis Ricotta and veteran sound effects expert Jimmy Macdonald. The result was an elaborate "click track" which enabled them to approximate Stokowski's oftentimes erratic tempo changes and thus match the music to the existing animation.

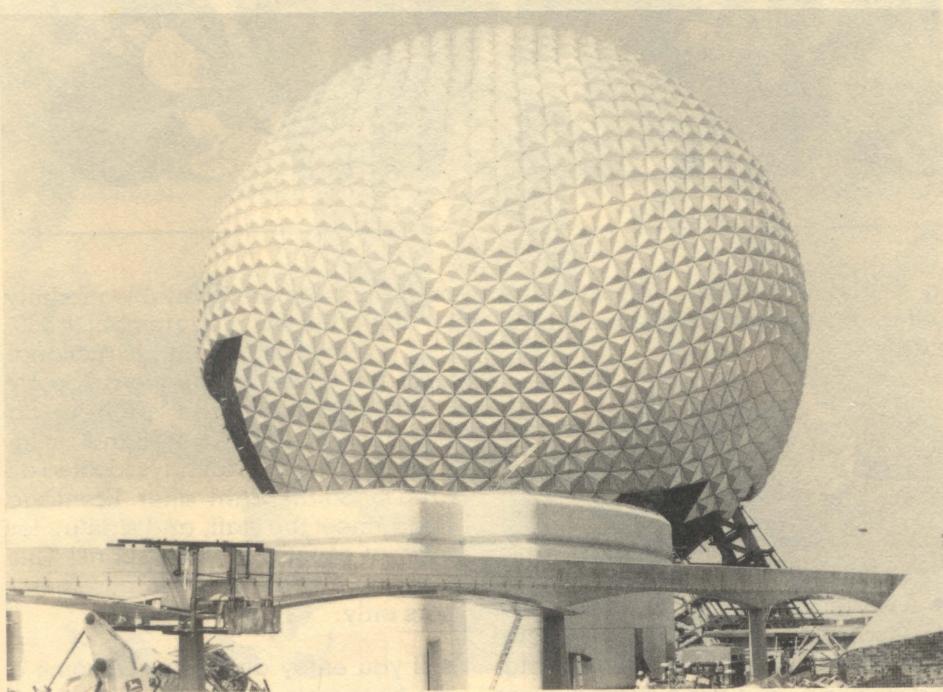

"Stokowski's freedom became my straightjacket," explains Kostal. "When he did it the first time, he did whatever he felt like doing because the animation came later. This time around we had to work backwards."

In addition to the improved sound quality on the new version of "Fantasia," Kostal has corrected a two-frame lag which resulted from the primitive recording techniques of the 1930's. "We put Stokowski right," says Kostal. "Now when Stokowski gives a downbeat on screen, you hear it at the same time."

Kostal was not totally constrained by the existing sound track. He re-orchestrated certain segments of the film to correspond with current tastes in music and the trend toward returning to the original composer's sketches. For example, "The Night On Bald Mountain" re-orchestration more closely reflects the original and bolder Moussorgsky composition rather than the sweeter, more romantic Stokowski approach.

"I don't want to be compared to the great Stokowski," says Kostal. "Each conductor must have a fresh viewpoint and his own emotional responsibility to the music. Although we tried to emulate Mr. Stokowski and match his tempos as precisely as possible, I think something of Irwin Kostal comes through."

SPACESHIP EARTH

With the monorail beam in the foreground and most of the Alucobond panels installed on Spaceship Earth, this Future World landmark appears for the most part in its finished state.

The U.S. Pavilion for Expo '77 in Montreal, while larger at 200 feet, was only a three-quarter sphere.

Architect Peter Floyd, a San Francisco planner, says the structure presented many unique engineering challenges.

Once the basic design was decided, planners had to determine how to make it weatherproof — what to do with tons of water plunging down from the globe's "equator."

A globe-girdling gutter was developed to collect the water at midpoint and channel it through the structure and its supporting legs to underground drains.

The upper portion of the dome's interior becomes a giant projection screen where a planetarium effect is achieved — one of the largest such show surfaces ever created. Achieving an unjointed appearance was another challenge for this night-sky effect.

The structure not only serves as housing for the Spaceship Earth ride system, itself a unique achievement, but each of its legs becomes a part of another structure housing service and show functions — retail sales, guest restrooms and stroller rental shops in the east legs; camera sales, lockers, more restrooms and Tour Guide offices in the west.

The two rear legs become a part of the Earth Station, the City "Hall" of Epcot Center. It houses the World Key Information System, an electronic guest service network also presented by the Bell System. The ride system track is 1,520 feet long. It accommodates 152 guest vehicles and 76 spatial effects vehicles. The cars rotate as necessary for maximum impact of show scenes.

Ascending the spiral trackway the ride vehicles, holding four passengers each, finally emerge into "outer space" and then rotate 180 degrees, descending backward down a slanting ramp structure.

Guests will view this scene — the Roman Ruins — during their travels through Spaceship Earth.

Fitting the giant show elements tracing human communication from the days of the cave dweller to a walk on the moon into this great sphere was another challenge, since the structure needs to be weathertight before sets are installed.

Providing a means for continuing service to the exterior of the geosphere was another solvable problem which begins with a ground-to-midsphere service elevator and then another lift traveling the narrow space between the inner and outer cores to reach the uppermost area of the sphere. Thus a problem, anywhere on the "roof" is accessible.

Outer surfaces will be covered with highly reflective metal on the supporting structures so that the "Earth" will appear to be almost floating in space.

Methods used in design and construction of the building are in themselves unusual. A detailed structural model made of plastic "I-beams" was built so that all details could be studied in three dimensions in advance.

Then three-dimensional blueprints had to be developed to enable contractors to visualize how the full-scale elements fitted together to achieve the spherical shape.

Then the work of putting scenery "flats" into this totally circular environment had to be studied and adjusted to create the effects, illusions and dramatic impact of the Spaceship Earth Story.
